'Solved' Farm Problem Continues to Irk Feds

By JAMES DORAIS

Over the years—and administrations—since the farm problem was "solved" during the early New Deal days by having Uncle Sam buy, at higher than market prices, the surplus basic crops that farmers produce, the surpluses have mounted and mounted in warehouses, sheds, caves and old Liberty ships.

One of the more appealing ideas advanced for disposing of these tax-paid-for surpluses is to send them abroad for distribution to the needy, underfed people of the world.

derfed people of the world.

The Eisenhower administration inaugurated a "Food for Peace" program to do just that, and the Kennedy administration is intent on broadening the program's scope.

Spokesmen for the new regime are placing lesser emphasis on the goal of reducing American farm surpluses and greater stress on the program as a cold-war weapon to increase American prestige by raising the world's nutritional intake.

Like so many worthy causes, however, the program's operation isn't as simple as it sounds.

For one thing, friendly countries with agricultural surpluses of their own to export complain that "Food for Peace" is unfair competition.

While the surplus farm products are supposed to be "sold" payments are not made in U.S. dollars but in foreign currencies which can only be spent, under rigid restrictions, in the country doing the "buying." According to the Wall Street Journal, the United States horde of virtually unspendable rupees, pesos, diars, etc., is nearing $10 billion.

In the final analysis, then, Food for Peace is a giveaway. But like other giveaways, there is insufficient assurance that it gets to the people who really need it.

Primitive handling and transportation facilities, thievery and black market activity in recipient countries impede the program.
